

THE Episcopal CHURCH

AUGUST 24, 2014 – ELEVENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

CAMPUS MINISTRIES

Leaving for college can be an adventure, but for many young people, it can also mean leaving behind the spiritual support networks they built at home.

“It takes time for college students to find community,” said the Rev. Mike Angell, the Episcopal Church’s Missioner for Young Adult and Campus Ministries. “The first months of college are charged with possibility, but a college dorm can be an unsettling space.”

Angell continued, “College is an incredibly important time for young adults, a time of deep formation, a time for making decisions that will shape their identities. The Christian tradition helps us to see that it is good to face big decisions and big changes with a community of support behind us. Finding a faith community can help a college student navigate the big questions.”

The Episcopal Church offers campus ministries on nearly 200 college campuses across the United States. For a map and listing of Episcopal campus ministries, visit <http://www.episcopalchurch.org/page/campus-young-adult-ministries>.

“Campus ministry can be a chance for college students to engage a wider world than just their universities,” Angell added. “Most of our campus ministries offer opportunities for college students to engage in the church’s mission in their local communities or across the world.”

“College is a time that helps young adults transition from dependence to independence,” Angell explained. “We hope that our campus ministries help young adults to make decisions about the kind of leaders they want to be in our world. How will their faith inform the decisions they make about how to use their talents and energy as we work to bring about the Kingdom of God?”

For more information about Episcopal Campus Ministries, contact the Rev. Mike Angell, mangell@episcopalchurch.org or visit <http://www.episcopalchurch.org/page/young-adultcampus-ministries>.

Students enjoy a class taught outdoors at Tulane University, New Orleans (Photo courtesy of Tulane Public Relations)